

A professor in the Neuroscience department at Corsen University has been accused of sexual harassment. 11 women, all of them former graduate students in the department, have come forward with stories about Prof. Jim Smith. The list of allegations against Smith includes frequently commenting on women's appearance, forcing students to have meetings with him in his private home, and hosting several hot-tub parties that included nudity, which students were present at. Witnesses also claim that it was well-known that Smith engaged in a series of quid pro quo sexual relationships with his female graduate students. An independent investigation by an external law firm was commissioned. If found guilty of sexual harassment, Smith may be suspended for an indefinite amount of time or even fired, a rarity for tenured professors. The report by the official investigation is based on testimony about his character by over 100 of his current and former students, and indicates that the facts are much less clear than the original allegations suggest.

Prof. Jim Smith is accused by 11 former female graduate students of sexual harassment. Claims are: he commented on women's appearances, hosted hot tub parties with nudity, invited female graduate students into his private home to meet, and he may have had sexual relations with some of his female graduate students. 100 of his colleagues and former students are being interviewed to see if these allegations are true. If they are true, Prof. Smith, a tenured professor, will lose his job, which is rare for someone with tenure. These 100 interviews will shine some light on the truth of the accusations.

A neuroscience professor at Corsen University allegedly has been involved in numerous sexual assault crimes. He committed acts such as commenting on women's bodies and nude hot-tub parties. Many women have come forward to testify and an independent law firm was hired to investigate. However, they have found that the facts are ambiguous and may not confirm the allegations.

Professor Jim Smith, in the Neuroscience Department of Corsen University, was accused of sexual harassment by eleven graduate students. The accusations alleged that he frequently commented on women's appearances, had quid pro quo relations with his students, and held several hot tub parties, involving nudity, that his students were present at. An investigation has been commissioned. The report will include testimony on his character by over a 100 people, and it appears that the situation is more complex and nuanced than the allegations suggest.

Professor Smith was accused by 11 of his female graduates of sexual harassment. The claims include making inappropriate comments, organizing meetings in hot tubs and even having sexual relations with some of his students. 100 of his colleagues will be interviewed to see if the allegations are true. If they are, Smith will be fired – it is very rare for a professor like him, who has a tenure, to be fired.

A neuroscience professor is the subject of controversy as many women have come out against him with allegations of sexual assault. Even though the women have said he's commented on their bodies, an independent law firm has concluded that the claims are too ambiguous

A neuroscience professor, Jim Smith, is on trial for sexually harassing and potentially sexually assaulting his graduate students.

Professor Smith has been accused of sexual harassment by 11 of his female students. He has been accused of making sexual comments and organizing meetings in hot tubs. He may be fired.

A neuroscience professor has been accused by multiple women of sexual misconduct. Even though several women have stated that he has commented on their bodies, an independent law firm has ruled that the evidence is too vague.

A neuroscience professor, Jim Smith, is on trial for sexually harassing and possibly sexually assaulting his graduate students.

Professor Smith has been accused of sexual harassment by 11 of his female students. He has been accused of making sexual comments, and organizing meetings in hot tubs. He may be fired.

A neuroscience professor has been accused of sexual misconduct. Even though several women have said that he has commented inappropriately on their bodies, an independent law firm has concluded that the accusations are too vague.

A neuroscience professor, John Smith, is now on trial for not only sexually harassing but potentially sexually assaulting some of his grad students.

Professor Smith was accused by eleven of his female students of sexual harrassment for innappropriate comments and meetings in the hot tub. He might be fired.

Accusations of sexual misconduct by a professor was deemed too vague by a law firm.

A neuroscience professor, John Smith, is now on trial for not only sexually harassing but also potentially sexually assaulting grad students.